This decision by the Board of Temple Cotton Oil Company comes after a study of shifting emphasis on crops and of the demand for more and better fertilizer in Arkansas' diversified farming.

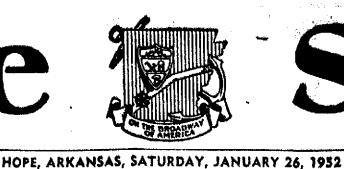

In the belief that the time has come to get into the oil mill business on the proper technical basis or to get out, we ordered several months ago a formal projection of a new plant. When estimates were completed, we considered the cost prohibitive for an independent of our size in the light of expected cotton production. In contrast, fertilizer consumption is on the increase. Therefore, we will be planning to improve and expand our facilities for the manufacture of plant foods for distribution in Ar

Pursuant to this decision, Madame Minister had an inspiration when on her return from a drive on a Sunday afternoon to "meet the Luxembourg people in their homes" she found three American soldiers on the steps of her official mansion and wanted to meet the minister. Mrs. Mesta invited them in and this was the start of the system of chowder parties on the first Saturday night of every month which draw American soldiers and other servicemen and the wives and children of some from supreme headquarters putside Paris, from Coleans, from Frankfurt and from the American harracks at Vordun not far away. MIKE'S Deadline Cafe was crowded with refugees from the ad agencies that fill the neighboring skyscrapers. Most of them wore the full dress uniform of the desk. From his side jacket pocket account executive, a gray striped suit and black knitted ties. Here they found fellowship at high peak.

Johnny Liddell leaned on the end of the bar with the ease born of experience, added to the gray fog that swirled lazily near the calling about?"

Liddell nodded, dropped the warrant on the desk. "What's it all about?" that swirled lazily near the ceiling. He watched the bartender stab at the keys of the cash register and dump in a handful of change.

The man behind the stick separated a quarter and a half from the pile of change on the bar in front of Liddell, shuffled off to answer a phone that had started shrilling somowhere.

Liddell took a sip of his drink. "It's for you, Liddell," the bartender called down from the other end of the bar. Liddell shouldered his way down to where the bartender stood holding the receiver. He took it, held his hand over the mouthpiece. "I make it three sixty since I been sitting here, Joe. Not counting my seventy-five cents which hasn't been rung up yet." The bartender grinned, glanced around, lowered his voice. "Wrong. Should be four thirty. You musts missed a couple of quarters and the two dimes. You're slipping. Liddell." Liddell growled under his breath.

What a detective! Can't even see it when it's being done right in front of my face." He held the receiver to his ear. It was the redhead in the office.

"You better get right on back, Johnny. There's trouble." "What kind of trouble?" The receiver sounded worried. "Real trouble, There are some men search warrant," "A search warrant? What are they after?"

The receiver hesitated. "They've got some sort of idea there was a man here this morning who left a package. They want the package."

Liddell nodded. "I'll be right up, Pinky, Tell them not to go away." The man sitting in Liddell's chair behind the desk was a stranger. He made no move to get up when Johnny Liddell walked in. He had an unlighted cigar clenched between his teeth, his eyes were cold and unfriendly. "I hear you boys wanted to see me. hepe I didn't keep you wait-

"Don't play dumb, Liddell. We know the old man was in here this morning. We know he left something. We want to see it," "Oh, him? I didn't recognize the name the way you pronounced it," Liddell grinned. "What's so important about this package?" "You'll hear all about it if it's what we think it is." "And if it isn't?" Liddell asked. "It'll be returned to you intact.

Your client will never know it left your hands." Liddell shrugged. "I guess it's okay." "It's got to be," the hard-eyed man informed him. "Suppose I say I can't turn i over without my client's permis-

"That would be too bad," there was a new, hard note in the T-man's voice. "In that case we'd have to conclude that you know what's in that package and that against the pailor of her face; you're in cahoots with Hong." "Okay, You talked me into it." Liddell walked around the desk, waited for Byers to get out of the chair, lifted out the package, dropped it on the desk. "That it?" "You tell me, Liddell."

"That's it," Liddell growled. The T-man picked it up, studied the seals.

"How about the seals?" Liddell asked. "He'll spot the fact that they've been broken."
"Let us worry about that," Byers told him. He slipped the package into his side pocket. "You won't regret co-operating with us, Liddell."

"You mean I had a choice?"
Liddell grunted. He dropped into his chair, glowered at the hardeved man.
